Weekly Notes- May 20, 2016

Dear Parents,

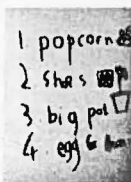

During a recent unit of study, our kindergarten and first grade students learned and applied high level skills as readers and writers of informational text. They learned about the purpose of nonfiction writing (to inform/teach an audience) and all about its features, such as headings and illustrations with captions.

Our teachers designed lessons to teach our young students how to listen for information and remember the most important facts. They chose interesting, yet simple books to read aloud and engaged the students in discussions about what they were learning. Then they helped them to record key details in their own set of "notes." The notes included sketches, labels, and key vocabulary words to help the students remember "what the author is teaching me." Eventually, the students learned to use their "notes" to compose "All-About Books" on the topic.

The children enjoyed drawing and writing about what they'd learned. They wrote using the "voice" of an expert---teaching their readers "all about" the information they'd learned from a book. The teachers and I marveled at their ability to recall information and retell it in interesting ways! We especially loved to examine the rich detail many of them included in their drawings.

Over the course of the year, our teachers have engaged their students in a study of many different genres- narrative, poetry, procedural, persuasive and informational writing. They have read stories, poems, and articles aloud to help their students understand the many ways writers share their ideas. I know you must be proud of the growth your child has made as a writer this year! I will include suggestions for ways to engage your child in writing at home over the summer in my notes next month.

Enjoy the weekend!

Warm regards,

Mrs. Herschlein

Annuals & Perennials for Your Spring & Summer Garden

Saturday, May 21 at 11am

Horticulturalist Paul Levine will discuss some annuals and perennials to consider for your spring and summer garden. In addition to specific recommendations, Mr. Levine will talk about: choosing the best location in your garden for planting; how much water your flowers will need; the best soil and fertilizer to use; insects and pests, and how to get rid of them. As an added bonus, a few lucky attendees will leave with samples of Mr. Levine's plants.

Q&A session follows. This program is free and open to all.

Advance registration is requested.
